DIGITAL TELEVISION LIKE YOU NEVER SAW OR HEARD IT BEFORE: FROM GLITCHES AND DISRUPTED AUDIOVISUAL FLOWS TO SCRAMBLED SIGNALS AND NOISE VIA AVANT-RETARD AESTHETICS AND LIVE MONTAGE – SOUND AND TELEVISION OFFERS YOU ARTISTIC RE-IMAGINATIONS OF THE FUTURE (AND PAST) OF LIVE DIGITAL TV BROADCASTING.

As a Transmission Art series, Sound & Television invites artists who work with the materiality of audiovisual flows to realise performances exploring the performativity of television: not live on TV, but live as TV. During six half-hour long television transmissions, a group of Danish and International artists develop performances where the transmission itself becomes the artwork. The performances all reflect on different significant aspects of the changing conditions of broadcasting. In the new DVB-T (digital terrestrial television) environment, the very transmission format of TV has changed, from symmetric analog to asymmetric data flows, encoded in the MPEG format and decoded through software implemented in everything from flat-screen TV's, set-top-boxes and PC's. "The cracking of LCD screens"...all is not smooth in this world of digitally compressed TV, as 25/05 ROSA MENKMAN shows in a performance based on her Glitch Studies Manifesto, creatively appropriating the hidden error-spaces accidentally opened up in new forms of encoding-decoding. Such compressed data signals are actually still transmitted over the air, meaning that there is still use for airwave monuments such as the Berlin TV-Tower. In "Loop Tower" (2005), 08/06 JACOB KIRKEGAARD explored how the TV-Tower also has a (spinning-) sound mechanics of its own, and for Sound & Television he will perform an adapted version of the original recordings. And what exactly does a TV-Test image for the digital and so called participatory media age look like? This question is asked by 04/05 DEMOCRATIC INNOVATION (Kent Hansen & Aharon Amir), inviting the viewer to come up with the parameters for a new TV-Test image. Although a test-image is a kind of primal image in the institutional context of TV, it is probably white noise which has attained this status of primacy in our collective cultural memory of the medium. The melancholic aesthetics of these b/w images are explored in 4NX, 27/04 AYMERIC MANSOUX's violent audiovisual sculpture where sound and image signals are alternately tuned into each other. If white-noise is the most pure form of TV sound and image interplay, then it's most corporate form must be the MTV music video. 25/05 SVEN KÖNIG thoroughly deconstructs the music-video form in a kind of digital de-collage through his software and performance sCrAmBled?HaCkZ! This artistic strategy of making the familiar strange again is also celebrated by 15/06 VICKI BENNETT aka PEOPLE LIKE US who presents her shamelessly entertaining new A/V set Genre Collage. Reassembling well-known film genres and icons, Bennett's piece reflects the fact that cinema has been increasingly domesticated in the home cinema age of 42" LCD screens. If digital television was once the stage for Utopian dreams of our active TV-future, broadcasters seems to have boiled these down to the oh-so interactive functions of turning subtitles on/off. No need to despair though, as LIND4 offers you 1000 compositions for making your television 'interactive' again, using the low-tech means of your remote control, scissors, scotch tape and the Sound & Television flyer.

Signal, noise, feedback, liveness and flow along with standardized production formats are all aspects of the television medium which are reshaped in digital, networked media. Rather than a stream-lined sound-image of digital convergence, Sound & Television will strive to act as a springboard for an aesthetic "media-clash" reflecting on the political-aesthetic of old and new media forms.
